DLP Brilliant Color is on board and defaults to a setting of 10 (on a scale of 1 to 10) on all display modes except Reference, which defaults to 1. At higher settings, the color brightness can get as low as 49% of white. This can make the white parts of images seem significantly brighter but can also cause them to blow out, especially in HDR. To the eye, a Brilliant Color setting of 10 looks ...

*Three-chip DLP projectors don't have this color-wheel issue because they have a dedicated DLP chip for each color. The downside of that is that it's much harder to properly align each panel, resulting in more complex designs and ultimately much more expensive projectors.
For that reason, three-chip DLP projectors are usually only found in high-end situations such as movie theaters, though
